Just finished reading Ronald Malfi's excellent FLOATING STAIRCASE. Seriously one of the best in this "ghost novel marathon" that I am doing. What makes Malfi's novel stand out is how believable the plot line is. Malfi writes in a first person format and I have to tell you, I often felt it was a true story...that is how real he makes it.

With Floating Staircase, Malfi brought his A-game to bear... and then some. It's not every day that you experience so many emotions in the run of one novel, and Floating Staircase is almost the perfect example of how an author can drag the reader along all of them. When Travis is feeling low about the circumstances that surround a painful memory, Malfi makes sure that the reader feels exactly that.

Ronald Malfi - Wikipedia
Ronald Malfi has been around the block a bit yet most fans know him just from Snow, a competent tale from the last of Leisure's real horror line. Floating Staircase displays Malfi's storytelling and writing in a manner which combines the everyday man and town of Matheson with the flowing, song-like prose of Straub or McCammon.

Ronald Malfi's 'Floating Staircase' is a case in point, a consummate example of the 'ghost story' archetype given a rigorous and gratifying reorganization. A ghostly tale with a vibrant heart, an allegory with a clearly realized purpose and a novel that stubbornly refuses to leave the memory long after the tale is over.
